Kashrus Shorts

Edition VI

May I purchase a kosher fish from a non-kosher fish store or supermarket?

- Obviously, packaged fish products with reliable kosher certification are acceptable.
- If you wish to purchase a whole fish or pieces thereof, there are a few details to ascertain:
 - Is this actually a kosher fish? We must have a positive identification, such as seeing a scale on the skin that is easily removable (without tearing the skin). Skinless fish requires certification; we may not rely on a label or identification by store personnel.
 - Has the kashrus been compromised? Any seasoning or brining could involve non-kosher. Soaking a kosher and non-kosher fish together would also be problematic. Salmon is often labeled "Color added"; this is not a kosher concern and indicates that pigment supplements were mixed into the fish's feed to give its flesh a brighter color.
 - How about cross-contamination from knives, boards and gloves? When purchasing portions which were packaged in a commercial setting (such as commercially prepackaged 1 lb. packages), this would not be a concern. For items which were cut behind the nearby fish counter, this may be a concern, and the following process should be followed before the fish is cooked. Take a straight edged knife and, using only minimal pressure, scrape off the area where the store knife would have cut (this would remove any non-kosher residue, no solid fish pieces are cut or removed during this process) and wash the fish thoroughly with cold water.
 - As with all kosher matters, if there are questions, consult your Rabbi.

Did you know..... that while kosher fish do not require shechitah and melichah (slaughter and salting), eating non-kosher fish varieties can be spiritually worse than consuming pork! (See Y.D. 83)
