Kashrus Shorts Edition VII

Fish & Meat

In halacha, we have a concept of Sakana (danger to health) applied to various foods such as peeled eggs, onions and garlic left overnight. Another particularly relevant application of Sakana concerns eating fish together with meat or poultry. Let us explore several halachic considerations to ensure our compliance with this Sakana-related prohibition.

The Issue: Like the prohibition against eating meat and milk together, one may not eat fish and meat (including poultry) together because of Sakana. However, unlike the separation required between meat and dairy, there is no waiting period between eating fish and meat. Rather, one should clean his/her mouth between them by eating and/or drinking something. If one touched the fish or meat with their hands directly (without a utensil) they should wash their hands.

Same Utensils: When it comes to meat and dairy, one may not use the same cooking utensil for both. The concern of Sakana regarding fish and meat is different. There is no prohibition against cooking fish and meat in the same utensil, provided the utensil is clean. Nevertheless, some have the custom of maintaining a separate pot specifically for cooking fish.

Same Table: When meat and dairy are served at the same table, a heker (distinguishing reminder), such as a placemat or another designated object, is required to help prevent them from being eaten together. This requirement, however, does not apply to fish and meat. Nevertheless, the common custom is to avoid serving fish and meat together at the same table.

Sephardic Custom: Many Sephardim also avoid eating fish together with dairy.
